"Kill the Company" is a training exercise that prompts people to consider the standard question—"How can we beat the competition?"—and instead ask, "How can the competition beat us?" By putting yourself in the competition's shoes and analyzing how to sink the company, you expose the things that are holding the company back—often the same things that are squashing employee engagement and innovation.

Mind-your-own-business, Soleirolia soleirolii, is a creeping perennial with tiny flowers and leaves. The branching stems root as they spread, forming a dense mat of foliage that few plants can grow through. The plant will soon take hold on any soil or lawn, although it's particularly prevalent in the crevices of stone walls and in damp conditions.
